Abstract:
The purpose of research at grass roots is to accompany the novice researcher in both the social sciences and human service professions, step-by-step through the research process. The description of the research process is probably unique in that the view of the process has been developed over at least two decades in the work with postgraduate students. The section for postgraduate students and experienced researchers is less structured, and discusses current topics of interest such as programme evaluation, intervention research, participatory action research, and analysis of concepts such as racism.

Show full item record

Full text options
Full text for this item is not available in ResearchSpace.

This item appears in the following Collection(s)
- Chapters, Books & Reports [3345]
through the research process. The description of the research process is probably unique in that the view of the process has been developed over at least two decades in the work with postgraduate students. The section for postgraduate students and experienced researchers is less structured, and discusses current topics of interest such as programme evaluation, intervention research, participatory action research, and analysis of concepts such as r