Drug trials in children: problems and the way forward
The need for children to participate in drug company research is high, and the temptation. In a 2011 article in the Journal Pediatrics, researchers discussed the problem of recruiting children for participation in clinical trials for drug testing. Researchers from Ohio State University (Columbus) and Case Western Reserve University, confirm that the US federal government is mandating that children be included in clinical research studies. Dr. Tishler, PhD, and Dr. Staats Reiss, PhD stated: Since 1994, federal guidelines have called for the inclusion of children in clinical studies.
